Abstract We present the key issues to consider in therapy with Muslim families. Following a brief introduction, five themes are presented: self, family dynamics, causation, and coping strategies. The section on "self" includes a discussion of three terms which link the four Islamic models of "self" identified through the review. The family dynamics section pays particular attention to interconnectedness, family roles, and gender. Causation is discussed with reference to supernatural and spiritual causes. On the theme of coping strategies, religious responses are discussed as are the roles of religious leaders, and professional mental health services. Clinical implications from the key themes are also discussed in addition to limitations of the published literature in this area. This includes a discussion of the epistemological and paradigmatic issues related to the research. The review concludes by summarising these issues and presenting areas for further research.

Introduction

Theorists and researchers considering cultural issues within therapy have highlighted the challenge of engagement with people whose perspective is not consistent with the dominant "Western Academic Scientific Psychology" (for an overview, see Matsumoto 2001). The Muslim population has been a particularly "under-represented population" (Carolan et al. 2000, p. 68). This review aims to synthesise some of the key issues to consider when working with Muslim families, according to published literature on the topic.

The health science databases of MetaLib were searched, followed by a hand search of reference lists. The search terms used were "Islam" or "Muslim" and "therapy". Articles were excluded if they were not available in the English language due to having no access to
